COLLECTING CASTINE:
An Interview with Doris Russell

When the Historical Society began work on this summer’s exhibit, Opening the Book: Literary Castine 1776-1976, several people advised to be sure to check with Doris Russell who had a lot of books about Castine and by Castine writers. It turned out to be invaluable advice. Doris has been collecting books related to the town for about fifty years, and hers may be the best collection of such books in existence. Thanks to her generosity, the books she has loaned the Historical Society will constitute a significant part of our display. Recently, The Visitor paid a visit to Doris to talk about her life in Maine - and books. What follows are excerpts from that conversation.

Getting Here
Bob and I were stationed in Key West, and he felt the Navy wasn’t letting him practice medicine the way he wanted to. Bob had gone to Bowdoin, and he wanted to return to Maine and establish a practice in a small town. So he took a rotating residency at Eastern Maine General in Bangor in 1949. That was in the period of the polio epidemic in Bangor, so he was not home much. He got just $50 a month, but we got $125 a month from the G.I. Bill, and that was a help. He had a lot of country patients in the epidemic. They would bring us vegetables and raccoon meat and bear and pigeon. It’s remarkable what you’ll eat.

Every weekend he got off, we’d drive around to all the towns with a hospital. Harrington [between Ellsworth and Machias] offered us a house. They were building a clinic and they’d do anything it took. It wasn’t really where we wanted to be, so Bob talked to Dr. Babcock, who said he wasn’t ready to retire, ”but you go over to Penobscot for a few years and see how it works out.” It was about half way between the hospitals in Castine and Blue Hill. Doctor Bliss in Blue Hill was about the same age as Dr. Babcock, so Penobscot was a good spot to be. We lived there in the house across from the nursing home for ten years.

When we started to build this house in Castine, we thought nobody would pay the $12,000 we were asking for the Penobscot house any time soon. Well, somebody bought it the first month, and we had to go somewhere. Fortunately, my folks had a house down on the Wardwell Point Road. The road would wash out; the snowplow picked up the kids at the end of the road and took them to school. We had a cow there. When we lived in Penobscot, we always raised a hundred chicks for fryers, and we had forty laying hens and kept a pig. We had a pasteurizer. When we got there, nobody had pasteurized milk.

I had a Brownie troop and the Cub Scouts, and a lot of those kids didn’t have books in their homes. The Little Red School House, that’s what it was called, was just up from Bob’s office, and it was empty. So I went to the Bangor library, and they were willing to give us rejects. Polly Hutchins, who had to home school her girl, and I made shelves for them. It was a big success. Kids would take out books by the dozens. The kids in Penobscot were smart kids, exceptionally smart it seemed to me, but without the advantages of Castine kids.

But that’s when I started collecting. When we moved to Castine, I brought that little shed out by Tarratine Street with me. It was the pig house on my father’s farm. When we bought Josie Brown’s house on Perkins Stree (Art Kiendl’s), it was full of “junk” turned antiques. So I opened an antique/book shop called Baron’s Book Barn to sell the

Collecting Books
Times were tough for everybody. They were certainly tough for the kids. If you had a handicap, they didn’t accept you in the school then. Home schooling was all you got. I remember Mable Gray and I were on a ride, and out by Johnson Point Road there was a man walking with a clubfoot. “There goes a home-made idiot,” Mable said. They wouldn’t let him go to school—and that was just a physical handicap, not a mental one.

surplus. When I started collecting Maine and Castine authors particularly, I found that if somebody was moving and they didn’t want to take their book collection, they’d say if you’ll take all the books for $25 you can have them, and in that batch I’d find three books that I would have paid $75 a piece for. So I started my collection by buying these lots of books.

I think I was interested in Castine books, because when I was in college, _The Little Locksmith_ had just come out, and I had to read it for my psych class to see what a well-adjusted person she was with her handicap. Then I get up here and find out what an oddball she was. Would I like to go back to that class and tell them what the real story was! But here I was in Castine with all these writers—Lowell who was Poet Laureate, Mary McCarthy . . . That’s just one of those things that happens so rarely.

A lot of the Noah Brooks books I have, I picked up at yard sales. People didn’t seem to know what they had. Margaret Ames gave me a copy of her book, _Those New to Sorrow_. Then I found another at the Library Sale! They shouldn’t have been selling it. I don’t use the Internet, but it has made a big difference in collecting. For instance, I don’t have a copy of Mary Cushman’s book, because I gave it to my grandson who was going to Africa. But you can still buy copies on the Internet.

But then you have so much stuff, you know you’ve got to do something with it. I have lots of duplicates of books like Wheeler’s _History of Castine and Redcoats_ because I have lots of kids. I don’t want anybody to be left out. Wheeler’s book still pops up from time to time. _The Little Locksmith_ was one of the first Book-Of-The-Month Club selections. That’s why there are so many copies of it around. I would buy them up whenever I found them. At one time I must have had twenty or thirty copies. If somebody moved to town who was new to it, I’d give them a copy as a housewarming gift.

I had some old mill-stock certificates from Milo—some papers a friend gave to me. I didn’t want the stuff, but it was from the twenties. So I kept it; but what do you do with it? I called somebody at the post office in Milo and said, "If I send this stuff up, can you get it to the historical society?" I heard him ask somebody who was with him, "Is there a historical society in town?" and the other person said, "Send it to Albert. He’ll know what to do with it." So I sent it, and I don’t know if anybody got it or not.

Taking Care of the Town’s Library

I was on the library board for twelve years, and the librarian was Barbara Trott, who was wonderful. She was the town psychologist and kept everybody sane. Barbara and her husband, Stan, dedicated their lives to that library. She didn’t hardly get paid. It was a crime.

Fred Dodge and I suffered through the saga of the Fitz Hugh Lane paintings. My kids would say, "Mom, you’re selling our heritage. Why are you doing this?" Well, to preserve them. They had been identified in Wilmerding’s book, and one day, Stan saw this dilapidated van pull up to the Library, and this guy came in and was looking at the paintings. Bless Barbara’s and Stan’s hearts, they started wondering who this guy was, and Stan went out and took down his license plate number. We called it in, and the van was owned by a guy in the Rockland area who had dealt in stolen antiques. Vince LaFlamme said “I’ll give you $75,000 for them.” So we knew we had something, and we knew it was a lot more than that.

They were sitting right in front of the window with sun on them and fly specks. They were cracked and in just terrible shape. We went to the state museum, the Peabody Museum, the Farnsworth Museum, the Boston Museum. Wilmerding came to see them to see if the National Gallery wanted them. The Maine Museum said they were just getting started, and they would sell them to help get started. Nobody would take them and sell them and let us get part of the profit. We would rather have them in a safe place. For two years, they were in the Farnsworth Museum, when they called and said, "You’ve got to take them back. We don’t want the responsibility."

We were getting very paranoid. Everybody said, “Just get an alarm system.” But the alarm system would ring in Ellsworth. It was ridiculous. We couldn’t get any insurance. We just couldn’t justify putting that kind of money up instead of buying books. We got them over to the Blue Hill Bank because they said they had an air-conditioned vault. So Clark Fitz-Gerald built us a crate for them—we even had a lock on it. Well, I was over in Blue Hill one day, and God knows why, I wanted to check on those paintings. I felt I had to look, and I wasn’t going to come back right away. I didn’t have a key for the lock, and I got a hacksaw and undid the lock. There was mold on those paintings. It was one of those things.

So Fred Dodge would put it in his house, and when he’d go away, I’d put it in mine, and when I’d go away, he’d put it in his again. We were so paranoid over those things, til we got rid of them. A lot of people were very unhappy about selling them, but we began spending some money and did some things that were badly needed. We had trees growing out of the gutters! We got the roof retiled. We did some maintenance that just had never been done. The building was just let go for years and years. I never felt any regret. Of course, later I learned that one of them had been resold for a million dollars!

Castine Historical Society
This summer the Castine Historical Society will cosponsor a one act play based on The Little Locksmith by Katharine Butler Hathaway, a resident of Castine during the 1920's. [See box on page 3.] Those unfamiliar with this poignant memoir may wonder about the origin and meaning of the title. In explanation, the following passage appears early in her book:

“When I was five years old I was changed from a rushing, laughing child into a bedridden, meditative one. As the years passed, my mother explained to me just what had happened, and why I had to lie so still. She told me how lucky I was that my parents were able to have me taken care of by a famous doctor. Because, without the treatment I was having, I would have had to grow up into a—well, I would have had to be, when I grew up, like the little locksmith who used to come to our house once in a while to fix locks. I knew the little locksmith, and after this, when he came, I stared at him with a very strange intimate feeling. He never looked back at me. His eyes were always down at what he was doing, and he apparently did not want to talk with or look at anybody. He was very fascinating indeed. He was not big enough to be considered a man, yet he was not a child. In the back his coat hung down from an enormous sort of peak, where the cloth was worn and shiny, between his shoulders, and he walked with a sort of bobbing motion. In front his chin was almost down on his chest, his hands were long, narrow, and delicate, and his fingers were much cleverer than most people’s fingers. There was something about him, something that was indescribably alluring to a child. Because he was more like a gnome than a human being he naturally seemed to belong to our world more than to the grown-up world. Yet he seemed to refuse to belong to our world or anybody else’s. He acted as if he lived all alone in a very private world of his own.”

[The Little Locksmith, p.14-15]

In order to provide additional context for this summer’s play and the seasonal exhibit at the Abbott School it complements, the following article is reprinted from the Spring 1996 issue of The Castine Visitor.

CASTINE’S LITTLE LOCKSMITH

Katharine Butler Hathaway, one of Castine’s many writers, is well remembered here, but still a bit of an enigma.

The author of The Little Locksmith, Hathaway was born in Baltimore in 1890. When her father was appointed to the faculty of Boston University, the family moved to Salem, Massachusetts in 1895, where Kitty spent her childhood, and where she died in 1942.

For about ten years, until she was 16 years old, Kitty was bedridden with scoliosis of the spine. The illness left her a hunchback, and quite small (about four and a half feet tall), with respiratory problems which plagued her through her life and eventually led to her death.

A voracious reader while bedridden, she decided to become a writer once she was allowed out of bed. Despite her handicap, she became a special student at Radcliffe College at 21 and graduated. Once out of college, however, she gradually turned inward. In her book, she describes combining an “absolutely uneventful outward personal life with a vivid life of imaginary experience.” She filled notebooks with ideas, descriptions, and views of nature,
President’s Report

At the annual opening reception on Friday, June 30, the Castine Historical Society will launch the summer of 2006 with refinements to the permanent Penobscot Expedition Exhibit and presentation of the remarkable new seasonal exhibit “Opening the Book – Literary Castine 1776-1976” developed by Paul and Dixie Gray and Jim Stone with assistance from Sally Foote and Eve Stwertka. All members and friends of the Society are encouraged to attend.

The Historical Society wants to thank everyone for adapting to the change to April 1st as the renewal date for all memberships. As of May 1st we have received nearly $14,000 from 370 members. If you have not responded yet, we urge you to do so. We rely on your support and appreciate your help. We realize the membership year transition may have caused some confusion, especially for those who had renewed not long before the change. If you think a mistake has been made in your membership, we hope you will let us know so a correction can be made.

Progress has been made regarding restoring the cupula and replacing the roof of the Abbott School. In March, the Board of Directors approved recommendations of the Building and Grounds Committee to contract with steeplewright Robert Hanscom of Greene, Maine to restore the cupula and with Crane’s Corner Roofing of Orland, Maine to replace the roof. Including contingencies, the estimated cost of the project is approximately $100,000. The schedule is to remove the cupula this fall and have the steeplewright restore it in his shop during the winter. After the removal, any needed repair or replacement of the cupula’s supporting structure will be done, followed by replacement of the roof. The restored cupula will be replaced on the Abbott School next spring. During the next few months, the Society will be raising the necessary money for the project by seeking grants from foundations, donations from individuals, and sponsoring special benefit events such as the Lakeview garden party and The Little Locksmith play and reception.

We hope you will be here to enjoy the interesting events planned for this summer, as we all look forward to seeing you.

New Exhibit Celebrates Literary Castine

This summer, the Historical Society’s new exhibit will focus on Castine’s remarkable literary heritage. When the exhibit committee began the project, we worried about having enough material. Along the way, however, we’ve uncovered more than 350 books by 48 writers, 18 different Castine newspapers, about 20 pamphlets and broadsheets, and any number of literary events from theatricals during the British occupations to a gala Dickens dinner in the 19th century, to public performances of three different pageants—an embarrassment of riches, showing just how bountiful our heritage is.

Photograph of Mary McCarthy and Philip Booth, by Kelly Wise, used with permission of Margaret and Philip Booth.

Then we wondered if there would be enough for a different literary exhibit next year? And if so, where would the dividing line lie between the two? The complicating factor was what Time Magazine once called, “Castine’s literary colony”—an unprecedented period in the sixties and seventies, when Robert Lowell, Mary McCarthy, Elizabeth Hardwick, and Philip Booth were all summering here, with Richard Eberhart across the river. In terms of national reputation, Castine had known nothing like it since the Penobscot Expedition. In addition, we realized that in terms of quantity of writing, the last fifty years easily matched the first two hundred. We also decided the “literary colony” was important enough to be included in both this and next year’s exhibits. So the dates we cover in the two exhibits will overlap. This year’s exhibit is entitled, Opening the Book: Literary Castine 1776-1976. It will draw on writings about Castine and by Castiners from Peleg Wadsworth writing from Fort George to the height of the summer colony. Next year’s exhibit will be Turning the Page: Literary Castine 1956-2006.

The exhibit will include brief biographies of the many writers featured, books and book covers, writing samples and pictures. The breadth of types of writing will be apparent—from poetry and novels to humor and hymns. There will be a map to show where in Castine all the writers lived or visited. Some highlights of the exhibit will include memorabilia and books of Noah Brooks, Castine’s most famous nineteenth-century writer, samples of the town’s newspapers, best-selling authors of the past like Pulitzer Prize winner Ellen Glasgow and Arthur Somers Roche, novelist and film writer (“the Danielle Steele of his day”), and “literary tourists” from Harriet Beecher Stowe to Hannah Arendt.

Touring Through Time

During the weekend of July 29 & 30 eight historical societies, along with the Jonathan Fisher House in Blue Hill and the Wilson Museum in Castine, will sponsor coordinated activities relating to the rich historical heritage of the eastern Penobscot Bay area. Participating societies include those from Blue Hill, Brooklin, Brooksville, Bucksport, Castine, Orland, Penobscot and Sedgwick/Brooklin. Several societies will stage special exhibits for the weekend. Others, including the Castine Historical Society, will have special hours for their regular exhibits. The CHS will also offer walking tours both days, led by Jim Stone and other docents. The tours will start at Fort George and end at the Abbott School on the town common. Each society will offer light refreshments. The Brooklin Keeping Society plans to offer bag lunches for a reasonable charge. The Penobscot Historical Society is planning a modestly priced bean hole bean supper for 5pm, Saturday, July 29. In Bucksport, the event coincides with the Bay Festival, offering more activities. Hours for both days are 10am-4pm. The Abbott School will be open Sunday at 10am instead of the usual 1pm. As the dates approach, maps, brochures, and additional information will be available.
which she adored and examined closely.

To help protect this secret life, she decided she needed a house of her own. It was unusual for a young unmarried woman to live alone in the 1920s, but with her physical problems, her decision must have been an anathema to her family. Driving around the country roads of New England, looking for her house, she writes that originally she had thought “for me, a very small childish spinster, it should be small, something mignonnette and doll-like.”

But what she found was the Mark Hatch house on Court Street in Castine. From her book The Little Locksmith:

Therefore when I noticed the FOR SALE sign on a very large high square house on Penobscot Bay overlooking the Bagaduce River and the islands and the Cape Roziere [sic] hills, and when just out of casual curiosity I stepped inside to look at it, I was awestruck by the force of destiny. I didn’t recognize this huge house at all. I had never seen it in my mind’s eye. But I knew that whether I liked it or not this at last was my house. It frightened me very much. And filled me with astonishing joy, quite out of keeping with my size and my spinsterhood. (page 7)

Although a very introspective person in her writing, Kitty, as she was known, loved to party and have guests in her home. She was known to shock the neighbors in Castine, particularly when she had a Japanese man staying with her.

When she met and married Dan Hathaway in about 1931, she sold her house to a friend, Mrs. Abbott Usher, and she and her husband went to live in Paris.

When they returned to this country, she tried to move back to Castine but ended up in Blue Hill, where she lived until her death in Salem, Massachusetts in 1942.

In the late 1960s, John Wiggins interviewed three of her friends: Mrs. John Latour, Mrs. Abbott Usher and Lorna Clement, who lived across Court Street from Kitty and helped care for her. The three interviews were published in the Ellsworth American and gave fascinating views of Ms. Butler. The three women’s memories of Katharine Butler Hathaway show how much loyalty the writer engendered in her friends. The interviews also show a woman who cared little for the conventions of a small town like Castine, a woman capable of deep passion who suffered both physically and emotionally throughout her life.

Kitty died shortly before The Little Locksmith was published. Parts of the book had been published previously in the Atlantic Monthly. The book received favorable and enthusiastic reviews.

Although Mrs. Latour says in her interview that Kitty left notebooks full of her writing and enough material for several more books, the only thing published after her death was a book of letters collected by her brother Warren.

Not many people in Castine still remember Katharine Butler Hathaway, but Phil Perkins does. [Phil Perkins (1909-1996) was a lifelong resident of Castine. Editor.]

“Kitty Butler was a saint,” Phil says. “I can say that, because she saved my sister’s life.”

“My sister had a problem with her jaw, and she was dying. Kitty took an interest in her, I think because she sympathized with anyone with a physical problem, because of her own problems.”

“She took her to Boston to a doctor who operated on her, and she lived another 20 years. Kitty was wonderful.”
HISTORICAL SOCIETY RECEIVES GRANT TO PRESERVE COLLECTIONS

The Castine Historical Society has received $1,270 to preserve and provide better access to its historical collections. The Maine Historical Records Advisory Board provided the grant with funds from the National Historical Publications and Records Commission.

According to Jim Henderson, Director of the Maine State Archives, a bureau in the Department of the Secretary of State, grants of this kind support community efforts to protect the stories of births, property transactions, local government, and how people lived their lives. He noted that “people need to document birth or naturalization dates to obtain passports or get medical care; others research property boundaries; some seek long-lost relatives or want to understand the history of the old saw mill down the road. Without these precious records, many questions like this would remain unanswered.”

This matching grant will greatly assist the Castine Historical Society in its efforts to disseminate information about historical records to other institutions and interested researchers. Volunteers will continue to catalog archival material and create the “paper trail” that will be installed into a standardized database.

More volunteers are needed to help sort and catalog the documents and artifacts contributed by our many friends and members. No special training or computer skills are required. It is fascinating work putting together pieces of the puzzle that constitutes Castine’s rich heritage. Call Sally Foote at 326-9787 and come join the Collections Committee.
